To help keep you informed about the coronavirus and how to protect yourself, National Geographic is providing free access to this story. To support more content like this, please consider a subscription.

Source: Johns Hopkins University's COVID-19 tracker

The model also assumes that no one in the local population is immune. The model assumes that the local population is immune. The model assumes that the local population is immune. The model assumes that the local population is immune. The model assumes that the local population is immune.

Vigorous exercise in direct sunlight is effective in reducing transmission.

Wearing a mask that is a high percentage effective—such as a group ofknit masks—is effective in reducing transmission.

An indoor gathering is effective in reducing transmission.
The risk of infection from SARS-CoV-2 aerosols at a given scenario 20 times more likely with 3 square feet of space per person.
To help keep you informed about the coronavirus and how to protect yourself, National Geographic is providing free access to this story. To support more content like this, please consider donating.

The model does not fully account for how dust and aerosol clouds will be affected by meteorological factors. The results presented do not include the contribution of dry aerosol and aerosol particles. The aerosol concentrations on the ground in aerosol clouds are minimal. The aerosol concentrations are minimal due to gravity. The model also assumes that no one in the local population is immune.